

Wikipedia Article Microsite - Notes from Mockup Review

Creative Director: David Liang

Developer/Designer: Annie Tian

I prefer mockup B to be developed further

Concept

Mockup B feels much clearer overall. It keeps a modern design while also bringing in more of the LEGO identity. The bricks at the bottom are especially strong, they add a playful, 3D feel, like the page is being built out of LEGO pieces.

Typography

I like the typography in both mockups since it fits the modern style well. I don't think this kind of type needs drop shadows, so I would avoid them. Instead, experimenting with color variations could make it more interesting.

Navigation

The nav bar in Mockup B stands out clearly and even feels similar to the raised studs on LEGO bricks. That's a nice touch. You could push it further by playing with button shapes and hover animations. Right now, though, the nav buttons feel a bit small compared to other buttons on the page, so sizing could be improved.

Structure

The structure in Mockup B works really well. The vertical progression from history/design, to sets/themes, to media, makes everything easy to follow. It guides the user naturally through the content.

Color

The overall color palette is good, but the blue feels a bit off. Since most of the page uses warm colors, the blue stands out too much and feels disconnected. The black text on blue also doesn't have great contrast. It might help to explore more button colors or add outlines to improve balance.

Communication

The page communicates information very clearly. It's easy to navigate and understand each section, which makes the overall design really effective.